This book is about Nina Harrison and how she deals with her vampire life. Nina is 15 when she is turned into a vampire in 1973 and she has gone to a vampire support group every Tuesday night since. She hates the support group and thinks most of the vampires are useless except for Dave, who was in a punk band before he was changed. In Nina’s eyes, this makes him the most interesting person there. After going to the group with the same people since 1973, there’s not much to talk about and they start going for each other’s throats.

The support group consists of Gladys who constantly complains about everything. Then there’s Bridget, an old woman who knits most of the time. Horace is a cape wearing, attention seeking loser that everyone has to put up with. Father Ramon holds the group meetings. Sanford is the unelected leader of the group who keeps everyone in his place and last but not least there is Casimir who started the whole virus. When they find one of the members dead they are appalled, frightened and confused. While they are looking for the slayer they wander into a whole new problem of dog fights, or what looks like dogs but could be something they never could have imagined. With the slayer on the loose and the dog fighting leaders after them they have no idea how to survive or defeat the bad guys. As the story progresses Nina realizes that most vampires aren’t useless and can actually be helpful…most of the time.

This book is written for teens that are interested in paranormal. The author’s writing is suspenseful and detailed. Each word reeled me in more. With all the action there’s never a boring moment. This book was amazing and I highly recommend it.
